'A must-have for every farm'.

Stacey Marriott won't dehorn her calves without Tri-Solfen on hand.

Stacey Marriott is a Queensland cattle farmer, operating her property, Mountain View, just north of Lakeland.

Established in the late 1800s to service the goldrush boom, the area remains a rich, agricultural region on fertile, volcanic soils.

It's here that Stacey runs 1,000 head of breeders and steers that she sells to butchers and local sale yards.

As a cattle farmer, dehorning is just part of the job. For Stacey, it's a procedure that happens year-round outside of the wet season and involves tackling 30-40 calves at a time.

A life-long pursuit to make animals' lives better.

Stacey always keeps an eye out for new innovations in farming that help to enhance animal welfare. And it was during a trip to her local supplies store that she came across Tri-Solfen.

"I asked what it was for and they told me it was a new pain killer."

Intrigued, she decided to give it a go during her next dehorning session and found it to work like a charm.

"Cattle quickly return to normal, rather than hanging around for days in pain. It's a great product. When I'm doing weaners, they don't go backwards. They're straight back on their feed and behaving normally."

That was around five years ago and she hasn't had an infection since. A one-litre bottle every six months is enough to tide her over.

"I won't dehorn without it. If there is none on hand, I will skip the procedure until I have some."

"The best thing is the cattle don't seem to be in pain, there is no shaking heads and suffering after dehorning and they heal up quicker."

“Animal welfare? That’s number one – eliminating the pain for them. That’s why this is one of my absolute favourite products and a must-have for every farm!”

Leading by demonstration.

Beyond her own farm, Stacey also works on other people’s properties. And she never misses an opportunity to educate a fellow farmer.

“I do day work on other properties. I make sure I take Tri-Solfen with me to show other people the benefits in animal welfare by using pain relief.”

“A few people have used antibiotic products and I’m now telling them to use Tri-Solfen.”

For Stacey, the animals must always come first.
