'A better outcome for animal welfare and our bottom line'.

Stuart Murray chooses Tri-Solfen for ethical reasons.

Stuart Murray is a farmer in Western Australia, running a Merino sheep and cereal grain operation.

Sheep breeding is a third of his business, using terminal sire rams and ewes to replace the flock. When ready, the animals are sold locally for domestic use, sent to abattoirs and sometimes shipped off as live export.

Four or five years ago was when Stuart first learned about Tri-Solfen.

"It was mostly for ethical reasons. We wanted to do what was best for our livestock."

While searching for something that would make the marking process less painful on his animals, relatives suggested Tri-Solfen, having seen impressive results themselves.

He decided to give it a go himself and see if it was the answer he had been looking for.

"Once we did, we saw it was better all round."

"By using Tri-Solfen when mulesing lambs, we can definitely notice a marked improvement in time to recover post operation. The lambs heal faster and are back to growing sooner, which is a better outcome for animal welfare and our bottom line."

A changing farming generation.

Stuart works with his father, and has seen the considerable shift that's happening through the generations of farming. Pain relief and prioritising animal welfare is now no longer seen as an extra or luxury, but a standard.

Since Stuart discovered Tri-Solfen several years ago, pain relief has now become an expected part of animal husbandry.

“The older generation are hard to talk around when trying out new products. But once we did, we could see the lambs healed up much better, quicker, and they were much happier.”

The Western Australian Department of Agriculture advises that in the case of mulesing, a registered pain relief product should be used to minimise trauma.

And with infection-preventing properties as well as pain minimisation, Tri-Solfen is the product that kills two birds with one stone and makes farmers' lives easier.

“We always used antiseptic on wounds but Tri-Solfen does the same job and offers pain relief.”
